Special issue on Occupational Health Psychology

Work-life quality is becoming an increasingly important issue nowadays. Individuals' mental health in workplace may not only affect employees' performance, but also the relationship with their family. If people work in bad psychological state, it may cause poor effectiveness in the organization, and in the end, seriously damage the competitiveness of the nation. Therefore, researchers start to pay close attention to occupational health psychology.

Occupation health psychology is a knowledge system that combines multiple important psychological fields, such as industrial and organizational psychology, counseling psychology, clinical psychology, etc. The research topics of this domain include work-family balance, work stress, job burnout, employee assistance programs, and so on.

In order to provide further understanding of occupation health psychology and try to meet the needs of organizations and society. Chinese Journal of Psychology calls for papers in the form of special issues for researchers who keep high attention on the occupational health psychology to submit research articles that related to this topic.
